What does a music therapist do?

A musical therapist is an allied health professional who has been trained at the University level to specifically to use music to address:

- physical,
- emotional,
- cognitive and
- social needs of individuals.

Music therapists and speech therapists can work closely to address a child's language needs through music.

Some ways music therapists and speech therapist can collaborate include:

- using music to achieve a child's specific language goals
- using music to regulate a child's sensory system so they can be better equipped to learn
- using music to encourage joint attention with a child to encourage social communication with the speech therapist / caregiver
